The Institute for Research and Information on Volunteering (iriv) is associated to the international solidarity for Ukraine attacked by Russia on 24th February 2022. After a pandemic that has weakened democratic countries with the disturbing rise of conspiracy theories and hate speech on social networks, we do hope this war in Europe will be an opportunity to reflect on a new solidarity, among European and international allies. This issue is the third for 2023 and the 13th since the beginning of the war in Ukraine. This issue is about a double language and a double game. “Smart power” is sometimes ambiguous – an effective strategy of influence aims to convince and win membership (Ukrainian example), not to brutalize and play a curious game of dupes (Russian example). The approach suggested by American researcher Joseph Nye (already mentioned in the December 2022 - issue 10 of our newsletter- “The shadow of a doubt”) is still relevant to the evolution of the conflict. It is surprising to see the same behaviour of defiance, coercion and even brutality when they have not succeeded in the past years. In the face of so much misunderstanding, of a feeling of dialogue of the deaf or of a broken record “never ending story”, we can wonder about the opportunity and relevance of such a game of dupes.

Ambiguity of “smart power”

Hard power is crucial in a world where states try to preserve their independence from states or non-state groups ready to resort to violence. It is at the heart of any national security strategy. It is associated with the ability to compel; it derives from a country's military or economic power. Nuclear weapons have been a powerful and convincing deterrent from Hiroshima.(1). It was a first ground of rivalry between the western countries and the satellite countries of the USSR from the beginning of the Cold War (2). It has often been brandished by authoritarian regimes to terrorize their neighbours and to impose themselves brutally (North Korea). The threat has been used by the Russian president since the beginning of the conflict in Ukraine. On the contrary, soft power is linked to the attractiveness of culture, political ideals and state policies. The concept has its origin in the criticisms of «American imperialism» and its supposed decline (3).

Faced with (many) criticisms, particularly about the concrete effectiveness of «soft power», but also about its evaluation, Joseph Nye, professor of international relations at Harvard after having been part of two democratic governments (4), proposed a new concept: the smart power. The ideal according to Nye is a clever combination of «soft» and «hard» that he calls «smart» (intelligent) power. The concept refers to “the methods of influence developed by a State that are not based on violence but on ideological or cultural elements in order to satisfy the interests of the nation implementing them”. A State always has the choice between brutal methods such as coercion, or on the contrary of finer means such as incitement or seduction. In all cases, the aim is to influence political decisions by making certain choices appear as priorities, so that their credibility and legitimacy are imposed.

This strategy of influence is aimed at public opinion, which is crucial to winning psychological war, an essential component of modern conflicts. The war of images, on social networks or through more traditional media (television, radio, print, etc.) aims to rally public opinion to its cause. Opinion leaders are responsible for relaying the messages to support a storytelling. Influence is an approach that seems constructive and induce a positive message. But manipulation is never far away when the means and strategies implemented are not precisely «smart»..

A retrograde and reactionary smart power in Russia

The argument used by the Russian president to justify the aggression of Ukraine was to present himself as a «white knight» who intervened with Russian-speaking populations persecuted by Ukrainian nationalists, heirs of extremist movements that supported the Nazi regime during the Second World War (5). According to the British historian Antony Beevor (6), a former officer of the British army and recognized expert on World War II, even though Vladimir Putin is a former officer of the KGB, the armed arm of the Soviet Union whose disappearance he openly regrets, he is not a “red” (communist) but a “white” (tsarist) .

His intellectual references are indeed those developed by the white Russians, who fled Russia during the civil war of 1917-1921. The «white» theories are taken up by the most ultranationalist Russian theorists, the «hawks» who pushed to attack Ukraine. The symbols accrediting this affiliation are numerous in the palace built by Vladimir Putin on the Black Sea. The double-headed eagle, symbol of the tsars, replaced the sickle and hammer. Moreover he repatriated the remains of two “white” leaders – Generals Anton Denikine and Vladimir Kappel. He constantly refers to the Orthodox Church, which has become a state religion since the revision of the Russian constitution in 2020 (7). He instrumentalizes a religious feeling (close to superstition especially in the countryside) by borrowing a rhetoric of holy war to break the supposed «satanism» of the Ukrainians and the Western world. The old saying of decadence, borrowed by the worst totalitarian regimes (Fascism and Nazism) is known together with a pledge of morality provided by the unconditional support of Metropolitan Kirill, head of the Russian Orthodox Church, who has been condemned by other more convincing religious leaders (8).

On the international scene, many «leaders» were sensitive to this discourse of a return of the «eternal Russian soul», with the reinforcement of stumbling species. The most convincing argument of the Russian president to his population, in addition to the terror exercised by corrupt security services (police and secret services), is the fear of a civil war – it has posed as soon as it came to power as the best bulwark against disorder. Yet the «official discourse» is beating away in the face of a massive mobilization of men of age to go to the front, transformed into «cannon fodder». Human life has no more value to Putin than the “mujiks” in the days of the tsars, who were persecuted and mistreated.

A “smart power” building and looking to the future in Ukraine

One of the most positive effects of the war in Ukraine is to weaken the Ukrainian oligarchs (9).. The fight against corruption has become one of the spearheads of the strategy led by the Ukrainian president, at a time when the country is calling for more western military support in the face of a new Russian mobilization. Ukraine is waging an exemplary war against the Russian army and the Ukrainian government is preparing its future within the European Union by giving pledges to its Western allies in the United States and Europe. The American economic magazine Forbes has released from its ranking several Ukrainian oligarchs stripped of their nationality because of their proximity to Russia.

In November 2021, before the war began, Volodymyr Zelensky passed a law known as “desolarchisation” creating a national register of oligarchs to fight against their political influence with three of the following four conditions to be included: holding media, being in a monopoly position in an industry, participating in political life and owning at least 55 million Euros. Oligarchs had to give up their television channels, powerful vectors of influence to make their business grow. The hope is that from the war emerges a more competitive economy with less political interference that will have more chance of entering the European Union (10) - a victory for President Zelensky with the support of the President of the European Commission, which may become a reality against all odds.

On January 23, 2023, a dozen Ukrainian government officials were fired by Volodymyr Zelensky, who “takes a hard line” in the face of a series of corruption scandals (11). Five regional governors, four deputy ministers and two heads of a government agency must resign, in addition to the deputy attorney general and the deputy chief of staff of the president, Kirilo Tymoshenko. The Ukrainian newspaper Pravda has dubbed him the “godfather of the regions” because he has enjoyed business favours in public procurement since the beginning of the war.

On the 1st of February 2023, waves of searches and dismissals were carried out against officials and personalities accused of corruption – the homes of an oligarch, a former Minister of the Interior, senior officials of the Ministry of Defence. The entire customs directorate was dismissed and searches were carried out at tax office (12).

Who benefits from crime?

By dint of exhausting an «adversary» for years, he becomes an «intimate enemy», a «beast to be slaughtered». Several scenarios are possible. The first is to get the job done – you managed to “break your enemy” by preventing them from harming them. Baffled, drunk with blows, he throws the towel. The second scenario is the opposite effect of the one expected – the opponent is galvanized in the face of so much adversity and low blows. The disproportionality of the attacks, their brutality, their repetition stimulate imagination and combativity. A third scenario is a huge feeling of weariness and a real disappointment in his opponent who after a final assault finally speaks to worthy interlocutors. You can't please everybody, but you know exactly who you want to displease. The low blows eventually discredit the perpetrator of the attacks.

Vladimir Putin decided to attack his Ukrainian «brother». He did not prefer the diplomatic «soft» way, he took up arms. He thought he would win a Pyrrhic victory, the human price (thousands of dead soldiers) never stopped him. It is not out of idealism, out of fraternity, out of "historical" solidarity, as he has wrongly explained. No one was fooled. Volodymir Zelensky did not choose war. His ambition was to apply in reality what he had suggested in his successful comedy series “The Servant of the People” – to bring Ukraine into an “ideal” 21st century by restoring democracy (free elections, plurality of the media, rule of law with a separation of powers, etc.), fighting the endemic corruption of his country that undermines the feeling of belonging and membership of the population, and making Ukrainians proud of their country. He did not expect in his 2019 election to face a total and brutal war with his Russian neighbour.

The military strategy as well as the war of influence of the Ukrainian president are in every way exemplary. Ukraine was not defeated; the first scenario was not realized. The Ukrainians are forced to face the Russian aggressor, they have no alternative to hide. The second scenario prevails, an ever-combative Ukraine, with Westerners at its side preparing for a war of greater magnitude across the continent. Whatever the scenario, one year after the beginning of the conflict, what is really the motive of Russia's «crime»? Why such an avalanche of hostilities without ever negotiating
